Hiring Team, Origin

Your posting says marketing wins on proof from real sites, not renders. That is already how I work. At Sensata I built the case studies and sales kit that 50+ reps carried into the field, and at Applied Materials I turn raw input from Sales, Engineering and Accounts into one story leadership can act on. OG-1 sanding and priming on a live job site is a better story than any render, and going out to capture that proof, then turning it into a case study Sales can use the same week, is work I already do.

I also run my own company, PriceKeel, where I sell an audit trail built on evidence instead of a sales deck, because RevOps and Finance buyers will not take a pricing recommendation on faith. That is the same instinct a general contractor needs before letting a robot near a live site: show the proof, not the promise. I have spent my career marketing physical, technical products, semiconductor equipment at Applied Materials and industrial sensors at Sensata, so I can sit in a workshop or on a site, follow what the engineers are actually saying, and turn it into language a contractor understands without one of them in the room.

I have also run the operating side of a marketing function, not just the content side: built and briefed sales kits and case-study libraries, hired and managed teams from an 8-person account group at Pixis to the team behind my own product, SwipeHire, and kept the OKR cadence that holds a founder's agenda together. Running a publishing calendar for three founders with three distinct voices and staffing a booth at a trade show are different days of the same job: find the real thing that happened, write it in the right voice, and ship it before the moment passes.
