Hiring Team, The 1970 Shop

The Bleeders and Leakers program I ran at Sensata started as an open mandate with no single owner: pricing opportunities scattered across sales, finance and distribution, with nobody tracking which one actually closed. I built the dashboard that turned 1,200 of them into a $433M shortlist by salesperson and product line, then followed each one through to a decision, recovering $700K plus in margin in two quarters. That is the muscle your posting is describing: track meetings, decisions and action items until they are done, not just discussed.

I also run that discipline for a company with nobody else to hand it to. At PriceKeel, the company I founded, I own the audit trail every pricing decision leaves behind so our CA and compliance partners can sign off without chasing me for context, and I run investor coordination and fundraising prep for our first round the same weeks I am closing customer pilots. Founder's Office work is not new to me. I have been doing it for my own company for months, including the parts nobody sees: the follow-up email after the meeting, the version of the deck that actually matches what was agreed.

At Applied Materials today I turn input from Sales, Engineering and Accounts into one view for leadership, and I run the OKR cadence and leadership decks behind our weekly and quarterly reviews: an agenda going in, a documented decision coming out. I built that same rhythm at Sensata and Pixis, where I hired and managed teams of up to eight people and reported recommendations straight to senior management. Coordinating with finance and compliance stakeholders, and turning a leadership discussion into something a team can actually execute, is work I already do every week.

What I would bring to The 1970 Shop is a habit of turning a scattered list of decisions into one tracked plan, and the discretion that comes from already handling a founder's confidential numbers as my own. Proof trail at adhithyabhaskar.vercel.app/ref/the-1970-shop.
