Hiring Team, Sure

Your posting says experience doesn't get counted, something made happen does. Here is mine: I founded PriceKeel, a B2B SaaS deal-pricing company, with no team and no playbook. I built the guardrail engine and audit trail myself, set up the CRM, CPQ, forecast reviews and deal approvals from scratch, and I am now running pilots with early customers while building the investor deck, data room and diligence materials to raise the first round as the only operator in the room. That is the founder's office job description, just run on my own company instead of someone else's.

I also know how to do that work inside someone else's company, which is the harder version of this role. At Applied Materials I turn scattered, half-formed input from Sales, Engineering and Accounts into one market-sizing view and a clear recommendation, the same move your "data and decisions" line is describing. At Sensata I sat close enough to the executive team to build the AP26 revenue models and site-transition strategy myself, then chased a messy pricing problem called Bleeders and Leakers from research to a negotiated close that recovered $700K plus in margin in two quarters, work that got me promoted from Product and Growth Marketing to Pricing Lead in ten months. Both roles meant picking up something nobody owned yet and not putting it down until it was done.

I already run Claude agents to automate the repetitive research and reporting in my day job, which is the kind of leverage a lean fintech founding team needs from whoever is managing the founders' time. I have hired and managed teams too, from an 8-person account team at Pixis to the crew behind my own SwipeHire product, so the operating and people side of a founder's office is not new ground for me either.
