Hiring Team, Lagrange Point International

The chief of staff seat you're running for your Bay Area AI startup client asks for strategic priorities translated into execution roadmaps with KPIs, plus a real pull toward automation and tech integration. That's the job I already have at PriceKeel, the B2B SaaS deal-pricing company I founded: I set up the CRM and CPQ, built the guardrail engine and audit trail that Finance and Sales leadership use to approve every deal, and I'm running pilots with early customers while raising the first round, as the one person who owns that agenda end to end.

I carry the same instinct for automation into much larger organizations. At Applied Materials I've built AI agents on Claude that take over repetitive research and reporting, which frees up time for the judgment calls a founder's office actually needs from its chief of staff. I run the OKR cadence behind weekly and quarterly business reviews there while carrying P&L targets for the role, and I turn scattered input from Sales, Engineering and Accounts into one market view leadership can plan against. At Sensata, I took a blurry pricing problem and turned it into a tracked program: I built the FY2026 dashboard against a $627M target, then ran the Bleeders and Leakers initiative on it that recovered $700K plus in margin in two quarters, working directly with senior executives on AP26 revenue models and site-transition strategy.

Your client is making its first India hire for this seat, and I've spent this career moving between the founder's chair and the room where executives make the call, which is the exact mix that bridge needs: someone who can run point locally with clients and vendor partners while keeping the founders' priorities, not a local read of them, driving the work. I've hired and managed teams end to end too, from an 8-person account team at Pixis to the team behind my own SwipeHire product, so stepping into ambiguity and building structure around it is not new ground for me.
