Adhithya Rokhith Bhaskar

San Francisco Bay Area, CA | arokhith@gmail.com | +1-929-563-9974

November 13, 2026

Hiring Team, Nextdoor

Your posting asks for someone who can tell you what actually makes a small business owner choose to advertise, not assume it. At Pixis I had that conversation daily as the account lead for 8 small-business advertisers spending $15K to $90K a month each: the ones who stayed on were the ones whose account strategy matched how their business actually made money, not the ones we pitched a bigger budget to. That same read on small-business motivation is what cut churn 50% across that portfolio.

I would push back gently on the idea that growth for small businesses has to come from a bigger ad budget. At Plug Power I cut cost per lead 50% by automating the WordPress-to-Pardot lead flow instead of buying more clicks, and raised organic search visibility 35% in the same stretch. The growth loops a local-business network needs rarely start with more paid spend, they start with removing the friction between a business owner deciding to act and the product letting them.

Positioning is the other half of this role, and I have run it end to end. At Sensata I led go-to-market for a new product line, drove $2M+ in first-year revenue, and built 30+ customer interviews that fed straight into the product roadmap and backlog I co-owned with Engineering, not just a marketing deck. Talk to the customer, change the requirement, ship the positioning: that loop is what "voice of the small business owner in product decisions" looks like once you run it, not just describe it.

AI is not a side skill for me either. I run Claude agents daily at Applied Materials to turn market and competitive research into decisions faster, and I am building PriceKeel, my own company, because I treat AI as a daily collaborator rather than a lookup tool. Proof trail at adhi-product-ai.vercel.app/ref/nextdoor.

Adhithya Rokhith Bhaskar