Hiring Team, Conversion

Before I ever positioned anything, I ran the stack your platform is built to replace. At Plug Power, the handoff from our website into Pardot was manual and slow, so I rebuilt it into an automated flow and cut cost per lead 50%. I know where Pardot, HubSpot and legacy marketing automation actually break for a MOps team, because I was the person waiting on them to catch up.

That is also where I would start on the competitive positioning your posting describes. At Sensata I built the go-to-market for a sensing product line that did not exist yet, positioning, pricing, channel and launch, with no playbook to inherit, and it closed its first year at $2M plus in revenue. The messaging underneath that launch turned sensor specs into customer language and lifted conversion 15%, and the sales enablement built off the same research reached 50+ reps and moved win rates 30%. Before any of that shipped, I ran 30+ structured interviews with OEMs and distributors, the same customer-calls habit your posting asks for, and those conversations fed straight into both the roadmap and the next round of messaging.

Owning the full narrative instead of one slice of it is the part of this role I would take to fastest. Sensata never put me on a single product pod either: pricing, positioning, enablement and customer research all ran through the same person, which is close to what a first product marketer at Conversion needs to hold together across three launch tiers. I also do not wait for a steady state before I write; the clearest parallel I have is building a product's story from a blank page, then testing it against real users fast enough to change course in days, not quarters.

I am also running Strategic Marketing III at Applied Materials right now, where I automate the repetitive side of market and pricing research with AI agents built on Claude, the exact workflow habit an agentic marketing platform would want from the person writing its own story.
