Hiring Team, Consuma

Your posting says the job is picking up what is undefined and driving it to done, without waiting to be told how. That is the exact shape of what I do at PriceKeel, the company I run myself: I built the CRM, CPQ and deal-approval process from zero because nothing like it existed yet, and I run pilots with early customers and investor conversations for our first round in the same week, closing each thread myself because there is no one else to hand it to.

The clearest proof of turning an undefined problem into finished output is the Bleeders and Leakers program at Sensata: a margin mandate with no dashboard, no owner and no partner relationships behind it when I started. I built the tracker that turned 1,200 scattered pricing opportunities into a $433M shortlist, then negotiated $700K plus of it back into margin in two quarters, working directly with senior executives on the AP26 models and site-transition calls the outcome depended on. The same stretch raised distributor and channel-partner margins from 53 percent to 61 percent, which only happens with constant follow-up to keep vendors and partners unblocked through a full repricing cycle, not a one-time negotiation.

The cross-functional breadth your posting describes, client work, hiring, finance and reporting, events, ops and admin all landing on one desk, is also familiar ground. At Applied Materials I turn input from Sales, Engineering and Accounts into one market-sizing view and run the OKR cadence and leadership decks behind our weekly and quarterly reviews. At Pixis I hired and managed an 8-person team running 8 client accounts at once, each with its own follow-ups and its own risk to flag to senior management, the same intensity a research engagement across brands the size of yours probably asks for. I have hired and managed teams at every stop since, so bringing someone up to speed is not new either.

What I would bring on day one is comfort sitting inside a problem long enough to build the tracker, the process or the relationship that closes it, and the judgment to flag the risk nobody asked about yet. Proof trail at adhithyabhaskar.vercel.app/ref/consuma.
