Hiring Team, Qure.ai

Prashant's post described the Bleeders and Leakers program before I ever worked at Sensata: a vague mandate, margin leaking somewhere across a $627M business, and nobody assigned to find it. I built the dashboard that turned 1,200 scattered pricing opportunities into a $433M shortlist prioritized by salesperson and product line, then negotiated $700K plus of it back into margin in two quarters. That is the same move your post is describing, take an ambiguous, high-impact problem and get it to an owner, a decision and a number, without waiting to be told exactly how.

I am also the person who founded a company from a blank page. At PriceKeel, I own every function a founder cannot delegate: the product, the CRM and CPQ, the deal-approval process, and the guardrail engine and audit trail that let Finance check a pricing call without pulling me into the room. I am running pilots with early customers and raising the company's first round at the same time, which is a good proxy for the "strategy and execution in the same week" range your post asks for. At Applied Materials right now, I turn conflicting input from Sales, Engineering and Accounts into one market view for a fast-growing semiconductor segment, and I use AI agents built on Claude to clear the repetitive half of that work so more of my time goes to the calls a model cannot make.

What draws me to this specific seat is the framing: a front-row seat to building and scaling, not a review seat one step removed from it. I have built leadership decks and run the OKR cadence for three different businesses, but the work I remember is the fast, unglamorous kind, negotiating a distributor margin up 8 points, or hiring and running an 8-person team through a client portfolio while carrying the P&L for it. Qure.ai's pace, the "immediate joiner" framing, the "sharp generalist" bar, matches how I already operate.

I would want to start on whatever is actually on fire in the first two weeks, not a curated onboarding project. Proof trail at adhithyabhaskar.vercel.app/ref/qure-ai.
