Hiring Team, Coherent Corp.

Your posting asks this product manager to review monthly financial and shipment results, catch the gaps, and coordinate the fix with Sales, Finance, Operations and Supply Chain, not just own a roadmap slide. That is the job I held at Sensata: I carried revenue and gross-margin targets for a multi-$100M Industrial BU across multiple product lines, and when the numbers slipped I built the business case behind the fix, recovering $700K+ in margin in two quarters by pricing against competitive gaps and customer willingness to pay across 20 product lines.

The design-win side of the role is the same muscle. I negotiated multimillion-dollar customer quotes with senior executives, ran win/loss analysis to see why a deal moved, and repriced distribution to raise channel-partner margins from 53% to 61%, all while defending share at key accounts. One level down, I owned the product roadmap and lifecycle plan for a sensor line from concept through launch, translating OEM and distributor requirements into a 100+ feature backlog with Engineering across three regions and cutting time-to-market 20%, which is the same translation this role asks for between what a customer needs and what is manufacturable.

I am now Strategic Marketing III at Applied Materials, sizing the semiconductor market with Sales and Engineering and building the forecasting models that feed budgeting and long-range planning across multiple product groups, the same forward-looking input your posting wants for growth and margin planning. I run the repetitive side of that analysis through AI agents built on Claude, which keeps more of the week free for the customer and cross-functional work.

That is the pattern I would bring to this product line: own the financials, build the business case before being asked, and keep sales, finance and operations working off the same numbers. Proof trail at adhi-product.vercel.app/ref/coherent-corp.
