Hiring Team, Reward360

I founded PriceKeel this year to fix a problem I had seen from the inside: deal pricing that runs on spreadsheets and gut calls instead of a guardrail Finance can trust. I defined the ICP and the pitch myself, closed and ran the first pilots end to end, and I am now raising the company's first round while owning the CRM, the pipeline review and every signed agreement. That is the same motion your posting describes for the EIR seat: find the customer, close the deal, then run the thing as its own P&L. I have done it once already this year and want to do it again inside Reward360.

Before PriceKeel I closed multimillion-dollar customer quotes directly with senior executives at Sensata, negotiating off competitive gaps and what the customer would actually pay, and recovered over $700K in margin in two quarters running that program myself. I carried a revenue target the whole time, not just a quota someone else set, and I was promoted into the pricing seat in ten months because the deals closed and the numbers held up at the weekly review. Selling to banks, NBFCs and fintechs is a new buyer, but closing with a CXO who needs to defend the number to their own board is not a new skill for me.

I also know what it takes to turn a closed deal into a business that runs without me in every room. At Pixis I hired and managed an eight-person team running eight client accounts, carried the P&L and revenue target for that book, and cut churn 50% through account strategy and renewal playbooks built by vertical, the same delivery-to-growth handoff your posting calls out. I automate the reporting grind behind that cadence with AI agents built on Claude now, so more of the week goes to the pipeline calls and the next hire, not the dashboard.

Engage OS already sits inside India's largest banks, which means a new business line out of the Founder's Office gets a warmer door than most first calls I have made. What I would bring on day one is a founder who has already closed the first customer, run the P&L and hired the team that scales it, not just pitched the idea.
