Hiring Team, Keycard

Your posting is specific about the handoff: an agency runs your GTM systems today, and the first RevOps hire brings that work in-house, not around a finished team but alone, for a while. That is the exact shape of the seat I already sit in. I run PriceKeel's CRM, CPQ, forecast reviews and deal approvals myself as the company's only ops person, so the parts of this job that are tedious, the routing rule that breaks, the report a founder needs before a board call, do not get handed off. I build them, then I document them so the next person does not have to guess what I was thinking.

That habit of shipping a working v1 instead of waiting for the ideal system is where the Bleeders and Leakers work at Sensata came from. I built the Power BI dashboard that tracked 1,200 pricing opportunities against a $627M target by region, stage and salesperson, but the dashboard was not the deliverable. The $700K+ I recovered in the two quarters after came from sitting in the deal reviews it fed and fixing the structures it flagged, the same loop your forecasting and pipeline-review line describes: definitions that Sales and Marketing actually agree on, not a report nobody trusts. I raised distributor margins from 53% to 61% the same way, deal by deal, through Finance and Sales sign-off on enterprise accounts with real negotiation behind them.

Two more things in the posting read like they were written for how I already work. First, automating the repeatable stuff instead of hiring around it: I run my own recurring revenue analysis through Claude agents at Applied Materials, which is the same instinct your event-lead processing and PQL-alert work asks for, not a tool I would need to be sold on. Second, deciding what to buy, build or replace as volume grows: I have made that CRM and CPQ call for PriceKeel with real cost and integration tradeoffs, not just administered someone else's decision.

A seat where strategy and the keyboard work are the same job, and where the team gets built only once the motions prove repeatable, is the one I have been building toward on my own. Proof trail at adhithyabhaskar.vercel.app/ref/keycard.
