Hiring Team, Storm Finance

Your posting describes a Founder's Office that turns ambiguous questions into operating mechanisms: review cadences, dashboards and escalation paths that catch risk before it slows execution. I built exactly that at Sensata. The FY2026 Bleeders and Leakers Power BI dashboard tracked 1,200 pricing opportunities against a $627M target across 3 regions, with a pipeline funnel, regional scorecards and stage distribution that surfaced $433M in margin gaps for leadership to prioritize by salesperson and product line. That dashboard, and the negotiation program built on top of it, recovered $700K+ in margin in 2 quarters and got me promoted to Pricing Lead in 10 months.

Structuring an undefined problem is also what PriceKeel is. I am the founder, so there is no department to hand the unowned piece of the pricing-approval question to. I built the guardrail engine and audit trail that gives Finance and Sales leadership evidence before they trust a new system, and I am running pilots with early customers while raising the company's first round, adjusting the build from what each pilot's numbers actually say. At Applied Materials I run the same muscle on a bigger stage, turning input from Sales, Engineering and Accounts into one market-sizing view and carrying the P&L and revenue targets that come with it.

Operating cadence is the other half of the job. I run OKRs with weekly and quarterly reviews, build the leadership decks that go with them, and have done it at every stop, from hiring and managing an 8-person team at Pixis to owning $100K/month budgets across business units at Plug Power that went to leadership for approval. I automate the repetitive parts of that analysis with Claude AI agents at Applied Materials, the same curiosity about where AI can actually improve a decision that drew me to what you are building in personal finance.

What I would bring on day one is the habit of turning a messy, cross-functional question into a number the Founder can act on, the same way I already do it for myself at PriceKeel. Proof trail at adhi-product-ai.vercel.app/ref/storm-finance.
