Adhithya Rokhith Bhaskar

San Francisco Bay Area, CA | arokhith@gmail.com | +1-929-563-9974

October 11, 2026

Hiring Team, Birdeye

Before I touched it, Sensata's sensing-product narrative read like a parts catalog: accurate, and useless in a sales room. I rewrote it around buyer value instead of feature specs, and launch conversion on priority launches moved 15% once reps stopped having to translate the deck themselves. That is the repositioning your posting is asking about, not the general idea of it: a narrative that broke under field use, and then one that held.

The part of this role I recognize fastest is making one narrative hold in rooms that do not read the same way. I built the sales enablement and case studies a 50-person rep team actually used, which lifted win rates 30%, and the same competitive and category analysis I ran across EMEA and the US fed straight into how Sensata's leadership positioned the business, not just how the field pitched it. A messaging system only earns the name if the keynote version and the objection-handling version are provably the same claim.

Birdeye's pitch rests on the line between software that reports and software that acts, and I'd rather show I live there than argue it in an interview. I run AI agents built on Claude at Applied Materials to do the forecasting and market-analysis grunt work, which is a smaller claim than "AI-native" but a truer one. On the numbers side, I spent a year as Sensata's Pricing Lead shaping the quotes and revenue models senior leadership signed off on, and the habit that stuck is knowing which number is cleared to leave the building and which one still needs a caveat. I also run my own small B2B SaaS company right now, so I've spent the same week pitching an investor and briefing a sales rep, which is the two-audience problem this req keeps coming back to.

I write short and I write fast, so the writing sample should be easy to arrange. Proof trail at adhi-product-ai.vercel.app/ref/birdeye.

Adhithya Rokhith Bhaskar