Hiring Team, Varaha

I built PriceKeel's financial model and audit trail from a blank page, then used that same model to raise the company's current round. That is the motion your Founder's Office posting describes: take a strategic initiative, turn it into a business case, run it, and show the number that proves it worked.

The operational-excellence side is familiar too. At Sensata I found a channel-pricing program that was not assigned to anyone and not on anyone's dashboard, took it from root-cause diagnosis to a negotiated fix, and recovered $700K plus in margin in two quarters while raising distributor and channel-partner margins from 53% to 61%. I built the playbook, tracked it against target, and kept it on the leadership scorecard until it held, the diagnose-build-track loop your posting is asking for.

I run that loop without owning a single headcount on the other side of the table. At Applied Materials I turn input from Sales, Engineering and Accounts into one market-sizing view they all act on, and I carry the P&L target, the OKR cadence and the leadership deck that keeps the quarter's story straight for people above me. Earlier roles add the partnerships and growth muscle: hiring and running an 8-person account team at Pixis, leading a 5-consultant team that sized a market down to a workable segment and presented the market-entry case to Safran leadership, and building the GTM and pricing for my own product, SwipeHire.

I already automate the repetitive parts of research and reporting with Claude agents, the kind of time back a lean Founder's Office needs instead of more headcount. Paying land stewards directly for measured carbon work, at the scale Varaha is already running it, is exactly the kind of structured, numbers-first problem I like taking end to end.
