Hiring Team, Autodesk

Partnership marketing usually breaks at one specific place, and it is almost never the place people talk about. It is not the creative. It is not the campaign channel. It is the moment, six weeks before launch, when the partner says "we want to measure awareness" and your team needs pipeline. If that conversation happens after the campaign is built, the partnership is already fraying. If it happens before, you have a real program.

At Sensata, I ran this exact conversation over and over with OEMs and distributors. Every partner brought their own definition of success: distributor reach, OEM spec-in rate, joint case studies, leads. I did 30+ interviews, found where their goals and ours actually overlapped, and co-built the enablement assets (decks, battlecards, case studies) around that Venn. 50+ reps used them. Partner win rates went up 30%. The content worked because partners helped build it, which meant they actually used it, and because we agreed on the metric math before anyone signed off on a campaign.

That muscle is what your JD is hiring for, and it lines up with three other things you care about:

Your audience is my audience. Autodesk Fusion sells to engineers, product designers, and manufacturing teams. Every B2B marketing role I have held has been to that same buyer. Sensata industrial sensors: OEMs, distributors, engineering buyers. Plug Power hydrogen: industrial and engineering buyers. My own degree is a BE in Mechanical Engineering from BITS Pilani. I do not have to translate between marketer and engineer. I have been both.

Partner portfolio management at platform scale. At Pixis I managed an 8-client B2B SaaS portfolio with $1.4M in budget across global D2C and e-commerce partners. Co-marketing, joint campaigns, weekly performance reviews. Client churn dropped 50%. Partnership marketing at platform scale is the same craft: understand where each partner's goals and yours overlap, kill the rest, stay disciplined about shared metrics.

Paid social and structured experiments. Meta, LinkedIn, and TikTok Ads through Plug Power and Pixis. A/B testing as my default, not a ceremony. I have run holdout incrementality tests, landing-page multivariate work, and cohort retention analysis. The JD's "structured experiments, test hypotheses, translate insights into action" line is literally how I already work.

End-to-end tactic execution shows up in the same places. At Sensata I co-built joint webinars, distributor open-house collateral, and post-event nurture flows that drove +35% qualified leads on a single product family. At Plug Power I owned the paid layer around customer summits, with pre-event audience builds and post-event remarketing. The tradeshow booth itself is the one piece I am newest to: I have marketed around events, not yet owned a booth cycle, and I am hungry to add that.

Based in Boston, 15 minutes from 23 Drydock. Would love to hear what the biggest partnership-marketing gap on the Fusion team looks like right now.
