Hiring Team, Performance Marketing, CVS Health

Performance marketing breaks when the analyst executing the campaign and the analyst measuring the campaign are two different people with two different definitions of success. The best performance marketers are the ones who own both sides: set up the campaign, manage the agency, run the creative review, launch, and then pull the data themselves to tell the team what actually worked and what did not. That closed loop is the only way to get from "we spent $X" to "we drove $Y in measurable customer outcomes."

That closed loop is how I already work.

At Plug Power I owned end-to-end performance marketing across Google Ads, SA360, Meta, and LinkedIn for a B2B audience. I managed the agency briefings, creative reviews, and campaign approvals on the execution side. Then I built the Adobe Analytics + GA + GTM measurement stack from scratch on the analytics side, so I could trace every campaign from ad click to qualified lead. The result was -25% CPA and +20% conversion. The lift came from closing the loop, not from running better ads.

Three other things from the JD that map directly:

Multi-vendor and agency management at production cadence. At Pixis I managed $1.4M in budgets across 8 global D2C and e-commerce clients, coordinating an 8-person team of creative, account management, and platform vendors in weekly optimization cycles. Timelines, quality standards, performance goals, partner handoffs, seasonal planning. Client churn dropped 50% because the operational discipline was tight, not because the strategy was clever.

Campaign performance analysis that drives decisions. At GenY I built weekly SQL dashboards on campaign performance, forecasts, and post-campaign outcomes for founders. The dashboards did not just report what happened. They told the founders what to do next: which channels to fund, which creative to kill, which seasonal moment to double down on. 16x ROAS came from that translation layer.

Seasonal and recurring campaign execution. At Sensata I manage cross-functional campaign calendars across email, paid, and content channels for quarterly product launches across NA and EU. I lead the coordination meeting, enforce the approval timeline, and make sure every asset is accurate, on-brand, and delivered on schedule. That is the same muscle as "own end-to-end delivery of assigned affiliate marketing initiatives."

I have hands-on Adobe Analytics (configured at Plug Power), Amazon Retail Ads and Criteo certifications (retail media for D2C clients at Pixis), and an MS in Marketing Analytics from Simon (U. of Rochester). Based in Boston.

Would love 15 to 20 minutes to hear how the affiliate performance marketing team is structured and what the biggest campaign-to-measurement gap looks like right now.
