Hiring Team, Gartner

Most "vendor problems" in paid demand are scope problems someone forgot to write down. The reason third-party syndication blows up six weeks before a renewal is almost never that the vendor is bad. It is that the SLA, the suppression standard, the lead-format spec, and the escalation path were never in the same document. The way you have framed this role, governance and net-new VP+ contacts as the headline, says you already know that.

I have run the buyer side of this exact relationship at two different companies. At Plug Power I built the closed-loop attribution that 3P vendors deliver into: I wrote the UTM spec, rebuilt GTM containers, and validated lead routing all the way through Salesforce campaign attribution. CPA dropped 25%, conversion went up 20%, and for the first time the team could tell a CFO which dollar bought which SQL. The MarTech plumbing was the unlock. Most "attribution" failures are tagging failures. Fix the plumbing first.

At Pixis I held vendors and clients to delivery, suppression, and lead-quality standards across an 8-client, $1.4M book. We ran weekly performance reviews against written SLAs, escalated underperformers, and replaced two channels mid-quarter when their numbers slipped. Churn fell 50%. The lesson I took out of that book of business: vendors and clients respect a one-page SLA more than a 30-slide QBR. Write it down before there is a problem and the conversation gets a lot shorter when there is.

What I have not done yet is run TechTarget, BrightTALK, or Madison Logic specifically. I have run the operating model. The named vendors are a week-one ramp.

One more thing on the JD's net-new VP+ language. Net-new is not just a top-of-funnel question. The suppression rules at the bottom of the funnel decide whether your "net-new" is real. I rewrote those rules at Plug Power. I would expect to do the same here on day one and use that to set the baseline for what good looks like with each vendor.

I am open to relocating to Irving for the right role and would want to talk through the hybrid cadence and relocation support. Happy to walk through any of the above in more detail.
