Hiring Team, The Hershey Company

I'll be straightforward about what drew me to this role: I've spent the last year doing price-pack architecture work, just not for chocolate.

At Sensata Technologies, I own pricing strategy for the Industrial Business Unit -- multiple product lines, three regions, 50+ sales reps who need to understand why this tier exists and that one doesn't. I built the pricing roadmap from competitive benchmarking across 10+ players, validated willingness-to-pay through 30+ OEM and distributor interviews, and translated all of it into tier structures that drove +12% YoY revenue and +8% market share. The packaging is different (sensors vs. snack bars), but the strategic muscle is identical: figure out what the channel needs, build the price-pack architecture that serves it, and get cross-functional alignment so it actually ships.

The part of this JD that really resonated was "guide implementation of PPA plans, including strategic briefings and consensus-building." At Sensata, I learned that having the right pricing strategy matters less than getting the right people to agree on it. I built battlecards, deal guides, and pricing decks for 50+ reps -- but the implementation only worked because I sat with sales, finance, and product individually before the big briefing and addressed their objections one-on-one. Win rates went up 30%. Not because the price changed, but because everyone finally understood why.

I also built a Power BI executive dashboard analyzing 1,200 pricing opportunities ($627M target) across 3 regions -- tracking margin erosion vs. price leakage with regional scorecards and action-priority lists. That project taught me something that applies directly to Hershey: pricing analytics isn't about having more data. It's about showing leadership which 20% of the portfolio needs attention this quarter.

My MS is in Marketing Analytics from Simon Business School, where my coursework included Advanced Pricing and Pricing Analytics -- the academic framework behind the applied work I've been doing at Sensata. I also hold an Advanced Pricing Certification and led a 5-person consulting team on a GTM market expansion project for Safran, where we built channel strategy across 4 verticals.

Hershey is the kind of brand where pricing decisions show up on every shelf in every store. I want to be the person behind those decisions.
