Hiring Team, Consumer Products Division, L'Oreal

Beauty marketing analytics is different from every other CPG vertical, and most analysts learn this the hard way. Purchase decisions in beauty are emotionally loaded, category loyalty is fragile, and the gap between "tried once" and "repurchased" is where most activation ROI quietly dies. The analyst who catches this is the one who tracks beyond the first conversion and builds dashboards that show what happens after the promo ends, not just during it.

I learned this at Pixis, where I managed campaigns for one of India's largest beauty brands as part of a $1.4M D2C and e-commerce portfolio. The brand was stuck at flat ROAS. I restructured the full funnel: Shopping feed cleanup, creative refresh aligned to how beauty consumers actually browse (visual-first, ingredient-driven), promotion strategy that drove trial without cannibalizing margin, and lookalike expansion based on repurchase behavior rather than first-click. 3x ROAS in 30 days. The insight was not about spending more. It was about measuring what happened after the first purchase and optimizing for the second one.

Three other things from the JD that map directly:

Activation ROI analysis and performance dashboards. At Sensata I built SQL and GA4 dashboards tracking activation metrics across 50K+ connected devices and developed post-launch recaps highlighting KPI performance for senior executives. At GenY I built weekly SQL dashboards on promotion effectiveness, catalog health, and seasonal campaign ROI that founders used for every budget decision. 16x ROAS came from the analysis telling them what to kill, not what to fund.

Cross-functional liaison between retail and internal teams. At Sensata I served as the primary coordination point between product, sales, engineering, and 3 regional teams for new product activations. Managed a 100+ feature backlog in Agile, routed internal approvals, and coordinated creative review across stakeholders. Cut time-to-market 20%. The liaison role your JD describes (Brand Activation, Creative, Supply Chain) is the same muscle at a different company.

Competitive and market analysis. I ran competitive benchmarking on 10+ industrial-sensor players at Sensata and hydrogen-energy competitors (Cummins, Ballard, Bloom) at Plug Power. Both were ongoing programs, not one-time projects. The discipline of maintaining a competitive view that informs activation priorities is how I already work.

I know I have more experience than the JD asks for. I am applying because the combination of beauty vertical, customer marketing analytics, and retailer activation is the exact intersection I want to build a career in. I am focused on the work, not the title.

MS Marketing Analytics (Simon, U. of Rochester). Open to Minneapolis.

Would love 15 minutes to hear how the Consumer Products team thinks about post-promo retention analytics right now.
