Hiring Team, Product Marketing, Steno

Most product marketing at growth-stage companies breaks in a predictable place: the product team ships, the marketing team writes about it, and neither one knows until three months later that customers never understood why the feature mattered. The PMM who prevents this is not the one who writes the best launch post. It is the one who sits in the customer feedback loop early enough to rewrite the positioning before launch, not after.

That is the part of this role I want to work on, and it lines up with what I have already done.

At Sensata I own competitive and customer intelligence for the Industrial BU. I ran 30+ structured interviews with OEMs and distributors across NA and EU, not to validate messaging someone else wrote, but to find the actual language customers use when they describe the problem the product solves. Then I co-built the launch assets (decks, battlecards, case studies) in that language, with sign-off from the customers themselves. 50+ reps used the materials. Partner win rates went up 30%. The work was less about polish and more about making sure the positioning held up when a rep said it out loud to a skeptic on the other side of the table.

Three other things from the JD that map directly:

Competitive intelligence as a program, not a project. At Sensata I run ongoing competitive benchmarking on 10+ industrial-sensor players. At Plug Power I built the same for hydrogen-energy competitors (Cummins, Ballard Power, Bloom Energy). Both are living documents, not one-time deliverables. The insight decays fast, so the program has to be continuous and owned by one person. That is what your JD is asking for.

Cross-functional launches at scale. I executed GTM for new sensing products across NA and EU at Sensata, coordinating product, engineering, sales, and marketing across 3 regions. $2M+ first-year revenue, +35% qualified leads. Managed a 100+ feature backlog in Agile. Cut time-to-market 20%. I know what "cross-functionally" means when it involves real stakeholders with competing priorities, not a kickoff deck and a Slack channel.

Founder-mode PMM. I built SwipeHire from zero this year. Defined the ICP, ran a competitive teardown, crafted the positioning, launched the product, and ran 8+ A/B tests on activation flows. 50+ users, +25% activation lift. At a company where one person owns the complete PMM function, that founder muscle matters.

Honest note: I have 4+ years, not 5. The concurrent scope at Sensata (pricing lead + product marketing + competitive intel running simultaneously) and founding SwipeHire closes the gap in substance, even if the date math is short.

Would love 15 to 20 minutes to hear what Steno's biggest "the customer never understood why the feature mattered" problem looks like right now.
