Adhithya Rokhith Bhaskar

San Francisco Bay Area, CA | arokhith@gmail.com | +1-929-563-9974

October 11, 2026

Hiring Team, Nudge

Your posting asks for someone who owns outcomes, not tasks, and calls an ex-founder an advantage. I am one right now: at PriceKeel I decided the product, the pricing and the buyer conversation myself, built the guardrail engine and audit trail that earns a buyer's trust before they sign anything new, and I am personally running the pilots and raising the first round. There is no department to hand the unowned piece to. It lands on my desk, and I turn it into a decision.

Brand and trust is not a new problem for me either. At Sensata I built the sales enablement, decks and case studies that 50+ reps used to win more, and that proof moved win rates 30%. At Pixis I ran 8 client accounts on media budgets of $15K-$90K a month and cut churn 50% with vertical playbooks built around what each business owner actually needed, not a generic template. That is the same instinct a trust-first, AI-run marketing team needs: the proof has to hold up when a skeptical small business owner looks closely.

Content and partnerships, and deciding with numbers, run through the same roles. I rebuilt product feeds for D2C brands at GenY Medium for a 16x ROAS lift, ran the SQL and GA4 work behind a KPI framework on 50K+ connected devices at Sensata, and wrote the PRD, positioning and GTM plan for SwipeHire from zero, an AI job-matching platform I took to 50+ early users. I write my own decks and my own numbers; nobody hands either to me finished.

What I would bring on day one is the habit of picking the live problem, whether that is a trust gap, a sales-enablement gap or a content gap, and closing it without waiting for a clean brief, the same way I already run things for myself at PriceKeel. I automate what I can with Claude agents so the judgment calls get the time instead. Proof trail at adhi-product-ai.vercel.app/ref/nudge.

Adhithya Rokhith Bhaskar