Hiring Team, Perplexity

Your posting frames the core test as holding two organizations to a plan when commitments start to slip. I have already run that test with numbers attached: Sensata's distributor and channel-partner margins were stuck at 53% when I took over pricing, and getting them to 61% in under two quarters meant repricing parts sold through a channel that did not report to me, on a timeline the distributor did not set. I built the accountability system for that work too: a Power BI dashboard tracking 1,200 pricing opportunities against a $627M target, with pipeline funnel and regional scorecards, so leadership could see exactly where the plan was slipping before the quarter closed instead of after.

Full-funnel and hands-on is the other half of the job, and I have built campaigns from the media plan up, not just from the brief down. I ran Plug Power's paid search and social budgets ($100K/month across multiple business units), rebuilt the Mar-Tech stack for closed-loop reporting, and separately owned the GTM for Sensata's new sensing product launch across North America and Europe: positioning, pricing, channel and launch, in one line, driving $2M+ in first-year revenue. That is the same joint-launch discipline your posting calls a launch moment: someone has to own the whole thing, not just the parts that are marketing's alone.

The relationship-builder half of this role is where the Pixis job maps closest. I managed an 8-person team running 8 client accounts with real P&L targets attached, and I kept the case studies and sales materials current enough that the sales team's own performance moved 20%. Trust with an external party you don't fully control, backed by content that has to stay accurate on their behalf, is the same muscle whether the external party is a client account or a partner marketing team.

I'm Strategic Marketing III at Applied Materials now, where I automate the recurring parts of my own market analysis with AI agents built on Claude, so the hours go to the judgment calls instead of the tenth version of a spreadsheet. I'd bring that same instinct to a partner function built from scratch: less time on manual reporting, more time in the room holding both sides to the plan.
