

Adhithya Rokhith Bhaskar

San Francisco Bay Area, CA | arokhith@gmail.com | +1-929-563-9974

October 1, 2026

Hiring Team, LangChain

Your posting asks for someone who can take "what the product does" and turn it into "why this matters for this audience, industry, or use case." That is the job I already do: at Sensata I owned GTM and positioning for a new sensing product line, translating sensor specs that engineers understood into a value story that closed deals with procurement and OEM buying committees, and that line scaled to $2M+ in first-year revenue.

The harder part of a solutions-marketing role is enablement, not messaging. Sales does not need a better story, it needs a repeatable one it can carry into the next call. I built the decks, case studies and competitive context that armed 50+ reps to sell a technically complex product with confidence, and win rates moved 30%. I ran 30+ interviews with OEM and distributor engineers first, so the language in that enablement reflected how the field actually talked, not how marketing assumed they talked. That is the same loop your financial services, healthcare and life sciences narratives will need: sit close to sales, turn what they hear into messaging, and keep it current as the platform and the market move.

I am also someone who already lives in the category you sell into. As Strategic Marketing III at Applied Materials I run AI agents built on Claude daily to keep market and pricing analysis current, which means agent engineering is not a concept I would be learning on the job, it is a tool I already reach for before marketing it to anyone else.

I would like to bring that narrative-to-enablement pipeline to LangChain's first solutions marketing hire. Proof trail at adhi-product-ai.vercel.app/ref/langchain. Happy to talk whenever works on your side.

Adhithya Rokhith Bhaskar