Hiring Team, Stuut

I run AI agents built on Claude against my own market analysis every week at Applied Materials, and the part of that job nobody tells you about going in is the checking: deciding what the model got right, what it missed, and what you still have to say yourself before it goes to leadership. That is the exact judgment call your posting describes for whoever markets Stuut's agent: know where it handles the work, where a person stays involved, and say so plainly to a buyer who has heard "AI-powered" too many times already.

Launch ownership is not new territory for me either. I ran the GTM for a new line of Sensata sensing products end to end, positioning through channel through release, to $2M+ in first-year revenue and +35% qualified leads at launch. The sales enablement half of your posting, materials reps actually use and feedback loops that make them better, is the same motion: I built the decks, demo scripts and win/loss debriefs for 50+ reps at Sensata, then rewrote them after the reps told me what wasn't landing, and win rates moved 30%. I also ran 30+ structured interviews with OEMs and distributors to turn their pain points into case-study evidence Sales could actually use, which is the muscle your proof-library ask is built on.

The buyer-translation piece is where I'd lean hardest. Before Applied Materials I led Sensata's Bleeders and Leakers pricing program, a Power BI pipeline tracking 1,200 opportunities against a $627M target, and negotiated multimillion-dollar customer quotes directly with executives. That work only lands if the person on the other side of the table, a controller, a finance lead, someone counting pennies, trusts the number. Translating "the agent did X" into something a CFO signs off on without a follow-up call is a version of that same translation problem, just pointed at a different line item.

I'd want this role because Stuut is still small enough that one launch's messaging can be wrong in a way that costs real deals, and I'd rather own that risk than hand off a brief and hope. Proof trail at adhi-product-ai.vercel.app/ref/stuut.
