Hiring Team, PagerDuty

Your posting asks for someone who can turn competitor signal into a battlecard the field actually opens before a call, and that loop is what I have run at Sensata. I benchmarked pricing and positioning against 10+ competitors, work that helped drive +8% market share, then built the sales enablement (decks, case studies) that put it in front of 50+ reps and lifted win rates 30%.

I also ran 30+ customer interviews with OEMs and distributors, an independent read on why deals were won or lost that fed straight back into product and pricing decisions instead of sitting in a folder. That is the discipline a competitive intelligence program needs: differentiation the field can repeat on a call, not a slide deck that goes stale after one product release.

PagerDuty's own pitch is speed, catching and remediating issues before a customer feels them, and I like holding internal work to that same standard. As Strategic Marketing III at Applied Materials I size the semiconductor market with Sales, Engineering and Accounts, and I automate the repetitive side of that research with AI agents built on Claude, so an update reaches the field before the competitor's next move does, not after.

I would welcome the chance to talk through how that competitive research and field enablement background maps to the program you are building. Proof trail at adhithyabhaskar.vercel.app/ref/pagerduty.
