Hiring Team, Greenhouse

The part of your posting that stopped me was "better together narrative," because that is the exact thing I built at Sensata without anyone calling it that. I wrote the positioning that turned a new sensing product into one simple story for OEM engineers and the distributors who resold it, and I followed that story into the pricing: repricing the same channel moved distributor margin from 53% to 61% in under two quarters, on top of the $2M+ in first-year revenue the launch itself drove. A partnership story only works if the economics behind it hold up, and I have run both sides of that at once.

Most of that work happened without a reporting line into the teams I needed. Product, Sales and Channel all had to move together for a single launch, and the only way to get there was packaging the "why this matters" story clearly enough that each team wanted to run with it. Now, as founder of PriceKeel, I sell a new pricing category into RevOps, Sales leadership and Finance against the CPQ tools they already trust, which is the same influence-without-authority problem your Strategic Development, Product and Customer Success teams will hand me on day one, just with partners instead of internal stakeholders.

At Applied Materials I carry that same cross-team habit into market sizing: Sales, Engineering and Accounts each see a different slice of the semiconductor market, and my job is turning that into one view they will act on, built on data they already trust because they gave it to me. I also run AI agents on Claude to clear the repetitive analysis work, the same kind of practical AI use your posting asks for, so the hours go to the judgment calls a partner launch actually needs a person for.

I would like to bring that same habit, packaging and pricing a partnership together instead of treating them as separate workstreams, to Greenhouse's partner ecosystem. Happy to walk through the Sensata channel numbers or the PriceKeel sales motion in more detail. Proof trail at adhi-product-ai.vercel.app/ref/greenhouse.
