Adhithya Rokhith Bhaskar

San Francisco Bay Area, CA | arokhith@gmail.com | +1-929-563-9974

November 4, 2026

Hiring Team, Kikoff

Your posting asks for someone to architect the strategic narrative for Kikoff's whole product suite, not just launch features inside an existing one. That is the job I had at Sensata: I owned positioning and messaging end to end for a new sensing-product line, cut the engineering jargon out of the pitch, and rebuilt the story around customer value, holding one coherent narrative across three regional launches and lifting conversion 15%.

The upstream half of the role matters just as much. Before I write a positioning line I run the interviews, 30+ deep-dive conversations with OEMs and distributors at Sensata that turned ambiguous pain points into roadmap decisions and raised CSAT 22%, plus a dozen more with early users while I built a consumer app, SwipeHire, from a blank page. That same habit, testing demand before committing the roadmap, is what you're describing when you ask a PMM to validate product-market fit for concepts that don't exist yet.

On pricing and packaging specifically, I modeled SwipeHire's three subscription tiers from competitor benchmarks and willingness-to-pay research, then ran 8+ A/B tests to see what actually moved activation. At Sensata I ran the B2B version of the same experiment, repricing a distributor channel through benchmarking across 10+ competitors, which moved revenue 12% and market share 8%. Either way the method is the same: test the pricing and packaging call, don't assume it.

Connecting Product, Sales, Engineering and Data around one roadmap is the part of the job I enjoy most. I do it today at Applied Materials, turning scattered field input from Sales, Engineering and Accounts into one market view, and I automate the recurring analysis behind it with AI agents built on Claude so the time goes into judgment calls instead of reports. Kikoff's move from one product to a multi-faceted financial ecosystem looks like exactly the kind of upstream, cross-functional problem I want to be solving next. Proof trail at adhi-product.vercel.app/ref/kikoff.

Adhithya Rokhith Bhaskar