Hiring Team, Socure

Your posting says every opening runs through one process because the product area gets matched to the candidate after the interview, not before. That structure tells me what you actually value: the underlying skill set, not a resume that happens to say the right vertical. At Sensata I owned go-to-market for a new product line into $2M+ in first-year revenue, then rewrote the technical spec sheet into positioning that lifted conversion 15% on the launches that mattered most. That is the work you are hiring for, regardless of which product area I land in.

The part of your posting that got my attention is the sales enablement scope: decks, datasheets, FAQs, and the collateral reps actually open mid-call. I built that stack at Sensata for 50+ reps, decks and case studies pulled straight from 30+ interviews with OEMs and distributors, and it moved win rates up 30%. Enablement content only earns adoption when it answers the objection a rep is already hearing on the call, not the one marketing assumed they would hear, and that is the discipline I would bring to Fraud, Identity & KYA, or Onboarding.

Market and competitor research is where I start, not where I finish once a launch is already scoped. I ran the competitive benchmarking behind a distributor price realignment that moved revenue 12% and market share 8%, and I led a 5-person team through a full TAM/SAM/SOM exercise for Safran that took 170 facilities down to a real addressable market of 28. Both were the same exercise your posting describes: turn a pile of market and customer signal into a decision someone can act on. Right now, at Applied Materials, I automate the recurring parts of that research with AI agents built on Claude, so the analysis time goes into the judgment call instead of the spreadsheet.

What I bring is the repeatable version of what your posting is actually asking someone to do: position a technical product, ship the launch, arm the sales team, and keep the research loop running underneath all three, then hand it off to whichever product area needs it most.
