Hiring Team, Anrok

At Plug Power I owned the account structure in Google Ads myself, set the keyword strategy and bid logic, then tied every inbound campaign back to MQL quality and stage 1 pipeline across 50+ campaigns, not just leads in a spreadsheet. That is the same discipline I read in your paid search line: build the structure, make the daily calls, and be able to defend the budget with data. CPA came down 25% on $100K/month across Google, Meta and LinkedIn, and a rebuilt WordPress-to-Pardot lead flow cut cost per lead 50% on top of it.

Paid social has run the same way for me, not as an afterthought to search. I ran 15+ A/B tests across creative, copy and audiences at Plug Power with clear hypotheses behind each one, and at Pixis I carried P&L for an 8-client, $15K-$90K-per-client-per-month portfolio, cutting churn 50% and delivering 3x ROAS in a single month for one account through a full-funnel rebuild: shopping feed, bidding, creative, and the landing page on the other end of the click. Running that testing cadence across a channel mix, including LinkedIn, Meta and retail media partners like Amazon Ads and Criteo, is the part of this role I would walk in already doing.

The reporting side matters just as much to me. At Applied Materials I built AI agents on Claude to run my own forecasting and reporting rather than rebuild the same analysis every cycle, which is the instinct behind "own reporting on paid performance" and "build the systems that let paid marketing scale." I would rather hand leadership a clear read on what is working than a dashboard they have to interpret themselves.
