Hiring Team, iQuanta

The Bleeders and Leakers program at Sensata started as a problem nobody had assigned to a function: 1,200 pricing opportunities against a $627M target, with no owner. I built the dashboard, ran the analysis across 3 regions, and negotiated $700K+ back into margin in two quarters. That is the shape of work your posting describes: nobody hands the Founder's Office a job description, you find the gap across functions and close it.

I run that same instinct across functions, not just inside one. At Applied Materials I partner with Sales, Engineering and Accounts to turn scattered field input into one market-sizing view leadership can act on, and I run the OKR cadence behind weekly and quarterly business reviews so cross-functional teams stay pointed at the same number. Founding PriceKeel pushed that further: I built the pricing guardrail engine, set up the CRM and deal-approval process, and I am now running pilots and raising the company's first round, all without a team to delegate pieces to. Coordinating product, marketing and sales around one initiative, which your posting calls out directly, is the day-to-day texture of all three of those jobs.

The market research and feasibility side of the role is familiar ground too. At Sensata I benchmarked pricing against 10+ competitors to defend a revenue-realignment call, and for Safran I led a 5-consultant team through a feasibility study that narrowed 170 candidate facilities to a serviceable market of 28, then presented the entry recommendation to Safran's leadership. Turning that kind of analysis into a dashboard or a decision memo a founder can act on in a single sitting is work I have already done more than once.
