

Adhithya Rokhith Bhaskar

San Francisco Bay Area, CA | arokhith@gmail.com | +1-929-563-9974

September 23, 2026

Hiring Team, MRI Software

Your Product Marketing Manager posting covers a full GTM stack in one req: positioning, sales enablement, launches, demand generation and market intelligence, work a lot of companies split across three people. I built that stack at Sensata: owned GTM and launches for a new line of sensing products across North America and Europe, wrote the positioning and messaging that turned engineering-driven features into a value proposition a rep could actually sell, then built the enablement (decks, case studies) a 50-rep team needed to sell it, lifting win rates 30% and driving $2M+ in first-year revenue.

My opinion on this work is that positioning and enablement are one job split into two deliverables. If the value proposition doesn't survive a rep's actual sales conversation, it isn't finished. Demand generation is the launch's distribution arm, not a separate lead-gen function: I ran the email and paid campaigns tied to those same product launches and generated +35% qualified leads, backed by the competitive analysis and market intelligence I ran across EMEA and the US that told the campaigns where to point.

I'm currently Strategic Marketing III at Applied Materials, sizing the semiconductor market with Sales, Engineering and Accounts and building competitive, value-based pricing for a market moving fast enough that yesterday's positioning goes stale by next quarter. I automate the repetitive parts of that market-intelligence work with Claude AI agents so the judgment calls, not the data pulls, get the hours. Turning a technical platform into positioning a buyer and a sales rep both believe is the muscle I've built launch after launch, and I'd like to build it for MRI's platform next.

Proof trail: adhi-product.vercel.app/ref/mri-software

Adhithya Rokhith Bhaskar