Hiring Team, Instacart

Your posting describes the Formats domain as taking 0 to 1 bets that keep CPGs and new advertiser types engaged, and that is the exact problem I spent a year living on the other side of. At Pixis I ran retail media ad formats across Amazon Ads and Criteo for an 8-client adtech portfolio, and I know firsthand how a new format either earns its place in a feed or gets ignored. A full-funnel rebuild of one account's smart bidding, creative and feed quality turned it into 3x ROAS in a month, which is the kind of proof a new advertiser type needs before it scales into a real revenue line.

The part of this role I find most interesting is the stakeholder math: you are serving sales teams chasing non-endemic advertisers, engineering teams shipping the surface, and a GM who needs the tradeoffs in plain language. I ran that same three-way conversation at Sensata, where I took sensor products from zero to one, owned a 100+-feature backlog with engineering across 3 regions, and ran 30+ customer interviews that reshaped the roadmap around what OEMs and distributors actually needed, not what the backlog assumed. The distributor and channel-partner margin work I did there, raising margins from 53% to 61%, is the closest version I have of negotiating with an external partner the way this role will with ad tech vendors.

I also bring a builder's instinct for ambiguity. On SwipeHire, my own product, I wrote the PRD, scoped the MVP and ran 8+ A/B tests that lifted activation 25%, so I am comfortable owning a bet with no playbook. At Applied Materials now, I run AI agents built on Claude to automate recurring analysis instead of re-deriving it every cycle, which is the same instinct for cutting busywork out of a fast-moving formats roadmap.

I would like to talk about how retail media operating experience, zero-to-one product ownership and partner-margin work map onto the Formats domain's next set of bets. Proof trail at adhi-product-ai.vercel.app/ref/instacart.
