Hiring Team, Xoxoday

Xoxoday runs one growth motion across three products, Empuls, Plum and Loyalife, into three different buyers, HR, Sales and Marketing, and pulling those functions toward one plan is exactly the problem a Founder's Office exists to absorb. I build PriceKeel and sell it into RevOps, Sales leadership and Finance every week, so I already run the job of getting three functions pointed at the same number with no one else to do it for me.

The rest of the seat is whatever the founder hands you next. At Sensata I built AP26 revenue models and site-transition strategy directly with senior executives for a multi-$100M business unit, then took the Bleeders and Leakers margin program from a spreadsheet to $700K+ recovered in two quarters, the kind of ambiguous problem that gets escalated to a Chief of Staff because no single team owns it. At Applied Materials I turn scattered input from Sales, Engineering and Accounts into one market view and run the OKR cadence behind weekly and quarterly business reviews, so cross-functional teams stay pointed at the same target.

Growth and marketing is not new ground either. I owned GTM end to end for a new product line at Sensata, positioning through launch, for $2M+ in first-year revenue, and led the cross-functional product roadmap with Engineering across three regions. Before that I hired and managed an 8-person team at Pixis carrying P&L for eight enterprise accounts and cut churn 50% through account strategy, the same retention math that sits behind an engagement and rewards platform's revenue.

I have hired and managed teams end to end, from that Pixis account team to the team behind my own SwipeHire product, and I already run Claude agents to automate the repetitive research and reporting behind my own reviews, so a lean Founder's Office does not have to spend its hours on busywork.
