Hiring Team, Dentsu Amp

The Bleeders and Leakers program I ran at Sensata started as a vague mandate to find out where margin was leaking across a $627M business. I built the dashboard that turned 1,200 scattered pricing opportunities into a $433M shortlist by salesperson and product line, then worked directly with senior executives on the AP26 revenue models and site-transition calls that decided where to act first, and recovered $700K plus of that margin in two quarters. That is close to the job a Chief of Staff does inside a full-stack advertising, performance marketing and content production shop: take what is scattered across clients and teams and turn it into one recommendation the CEO can act on.

I also run the operating rhythm underneath that kind of number, not just the number itself. As founder of PriceKeel, I set up the company's own CRM, CPQ and deal approvals and built the audit trail that lets Finance check a pricing decision without calling me first, while running pilots and raising the company's first round myself. At Applied Materials today I run the OKR cadence and leadership decks behind weekly and quarterly business reviews, the same prep work that gets an executive ready to walk into a meeting with an answer instead of a status update.

Annual planning and budgeting is familiar ground too. At Plug Power I owned $100K a month in marketing budgets across multiple business units and built the plans and forecasts that leadership actually approved, not just reviewed. My background sits in marketing and GTM work for B2B SaaS, industrial tech and D2C clients, the same discipline this industry runs on from a different angle.

What I think this seat rewards is someone who has actually carried a P&L number under pressure, not just synthesized someone else's slide deck, and that is the habit I would bring to it. Proof trail at adhithyabhaskar.vercel.app/ref/dentsu-amp.
