Hiring Team, Outreach

A monthly release cadence is where product marketing either becomes the connective tissue between engineering and the field, or turns into after-the-fact announcements nobody reads. At Sensata I ran go-to-market for a quarterly launch cycle on sensing products, owning positioning, pricing and channel end to end, and it drove $2M+ in first-year revenue with +35% qualified leads. That is the job you are describing for Outreach's release and launch calendar: someone who treats each cycle as a real GTM motion, not a changelog.

The competitive positioning and launch content side of this role is where I spend most of my time already. I wrote the positioning that turned technical sensing features into a buyer value story and lifted conversion 15% on priority launches, then built the sales enablement and case studies that took a 50-person rep team's win rate up 30%. I also ran the competitor and market analysis across EMEA and the US that fed those decisions, and routed what I learned from 30+ OEM and distributor interviews straight back to product leadership rather than keeping it in a deck nobody outside marketing saw.

Stakeholder influence is less about a title and more about whether Sales, Engineering and the exec team actually act on what you send them. At Applied Materials I turn multi-product-group forecasting into one market view those three functions use directly, and I run AI agents built on Claude to cut the time I spend on repetitive analysis so I can spend more of it on the story. I'd rather show curiosity about AI by using it weekly than by name-dropping it in an interview.
